

Acknowledgements to the second edition

My main thanks in writing this second edition go to the 15 000 people who have bought copies of the first edition, and who therefore make this second edition a worthwhile proposal. I should also like to thank those people who have provided advice and encouragement over the five years since the first edition appeared, and who have made me think this second edition will be welcomed.

I should like to thank the people with whom I have worked over the last five years, developing new material incorporated into this book, including Robert Cochrane (Coopers & Lybrand), Lynne Crawford (University of Technology, Sydney), Mike Hougham (consultant), John Payne (Line Management Group Ltd), Arnon Speiser (IBM), and John Wateridge (Bournemouth University).

I should also like to thank Alison Pyper and Billy Meehan, my partners in EuroProjex, for their support, allowing me time to work on my books, while they run the business, and Kristoffer Grude for his continued friendship and advice. I must also thank Alison for helping with the preparation of the manuscript. We have had role reversal, with my doing the typing, and Alison the proofreading.

And finally I must thank my family for putting up with all the travel that spreading the good word of Project Management seems to entail.

Acknowledgements to the first edition

The content of this book is based largely on my experience as a project manager and consultant. I am grateful to the organization that provided my experience, including my employers (ICI, Coopers & Lybrand, Henley Management College), and those whom I have advised as a consultant. Through Henley, I have had contact with many practising project managers and organizations such as the European Construction Institute and the Association for Project Management, all of whom have provided insights. My clients I cannot mention, both because they are too many and because I need to preserve their confidence. However, I should like to thank Steve Kenny for the pleasure of working on his projects, and for providing the model on which the running case study in this book is based. (Although the case study is based on a project on which I worked, the company in which it is set is totally fictitious.)

I also wish to thank the people mentioned below, who contributed distance learning material – through course material or through articles written jointly – for courses at Henley Management College: John Dingle (Oxford College of Petroleum Studies); Lynn Thurloway, Frances Clark, Alex Lord, Mahen Tampoe, Debbie Carlton, Susan Foreman, Padma Nathan and Svine-Arne Jessen (Henley Management College); Peter Morris (Bovis and Templeton College, Oxford); Julie Hartley (University of Central England); Alan Oliver (SD-Scion); Simon Bissel (British Aerospace); Bob Thomas (W.S. Atkins); Morten Fangel (Management Consultant); Nick Aked and Roger Sharp (Coopers & Lybrand); Paddy Lewis and Martin Samphire (Nichols Associates); Richard Morreale (Life Cycle Management Systems); Jancie Light and Gordon Edge (Scientific Generics Ltd); David Topping (Peter Brett Associates); Steven Kirk (Brown & Root Vickers) and Anne French (Farnborough College). Their contributions have, with acknowledgement, been incorporated to a greater or lesser extent into corresponding chapters in this book.

I should like to thank all the people who have given support and advice while I have been writing the text, and in particular Kate Allen the editor and the reviewers whom McGraw-Hill asked to peruse early proposals and manuscripts. Their comments and advice have been very valuable.

As great as the contribution of all these people has been, it is small compared to that of Kristoffer Grude, Tor Haug and Erling Andersen. Their book, Goal Directed Project Management, the English edition of which I wrote, provided the embryonic structure and approach of this book. However, their contribution has gone further: a section of Chapter 3 is derived from a paper I wrote jointly with Tor, and I have spent many hours with Kristoffer sharing his experience and philosophy of project management. To acknowledge the direct contribution of these authors would require repeated statements in Chapters 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 14 and 18. To acknowledge their indirect contribution would require statements on almost every page.

Finally, I would like to thank the following people who have contributed to this book in their own way: Beverley, my wife, who gave me the space to work on my projects; John Logan, who provided the opportunity to develop the material of my previous book into the present structure; and David Birchall, since without my liaison with Henley I would not have had the opportunity to develop the material or approach.
